Introduction
Over the last decade, objective validated questionnaires measuring subjective perceptions have improved our understanding of erectile dysfunction treatment. We employed the Erectile Dysfunction Inventory of Treatment Satisfaction (EDITS) to assess fulfillment among Hispanic men who received a 3-piece Inflatable penile prosthesis (IPP).

Methods
- Retrospective analysis of prospectively collected outcome data from the Urologic Research Network (multi-institutional private practices) of Miami FL.
- Between 7/2008 and 11/2010, 193 Hispanic men received IPP.
- 157 completed EDITS at ≥ 6 months after surgery.
- Mean time of completion was 18 mo. (6-30).
- Median patient age was 69.
- EDITS surveyed effectiveness of treatment, side effects, ease of use, naturalness and impact on partner.

Results
- Average weighted EDITS patient satisfaction was 87% (interquartiles 72, 94).
- 143 (91%) found the device easy to use, continued to use it, and admitted use within the last month.
- Rate of confidence during intercourse was 94% and 82% described themselves as very confident.
- 57% perceived their erections as natural.
- 76% believed their partners were satisfied.

Conclusions
Hispanic men rate satisfaction with the IPP very high according to validated testing. The men use the device often, and most believe the erection is natural and their partners are satisfied.
